Imagine a wide valley shut that which has just been completed at Wal in on all sides by high mountains, the only outlet a narrow canon, through which the water runs. Place a dam across the opening of the canon where it leaves the valley, and the valley at once becomee a lake Triennial Conclave Knights Templar, basin. In fact, the geological formation shows that this valley once was an inland lake, the surrounding mountains intact, lake, the surrounding mountains intact, and the canon but gradually worn away by the outflowing water. Block up the mouth of the canon by an artificial dam, and the ancient lake is replaced. This is exactly what has been done in building the storage reservoirs at Walnut grove. More than a year was required to complete the dam, the work going on night and day right through the scorching summer. It was built of solid masonry, and as finished stands 110 feet high.

At last the workmen were gone, leaving only a few curious idlers who were waitsour River Points to Montana.

Though the heavy rain was over within twenty-four hours, the water has risen continually until now it stands 105 feet deep by the dam. The debris on the surface has sunk or blown away, leaving the lake surprisingly clear and blue. The clumps of cotton woods once growing on the stranger for the round trip from Helena to Washingcotton woods once growing on the steep banks of the Hassayampa now stand in the middle of the lake, their fres.ily leafed tops casting feathery shadows on the water, and making little summer bowers beneath which you can rock in your boat and listen to the plashing of the ways.

But the lake has other than picturesque aspects. The millions of gailous of water stored in its reservoir are, to many an Arizonian, a much more tangible proof of the possibilities of the rainfall than ever would have been gained from the records of the signal service. The initial costly experiment of water storage has been tried, and it has resulted successfully.
